

INAMP becomes an implementing partner of the Climate and Gender Community of Practitioners

Climate, communities and local capacity: INAMP becomes an implementation partner within the Climate and Gender Community of Practitioners.

Climate change affects the development of localities, public services, quality of life and the resilience of communities. For solutions to be effective, they must be built together with residents, adapted to local realities and developed through inclusive, gender-sensitive approaches. ☐☐ in this context, the LEADER National Rural Development Network (RNDRL), in partnership with the National Institute of Public Administration and Management (INAMP), is launching the Community of Practitioners for Climate and Gender.

- The community will act as a national framework for collaboration, applied learning and exchange of best practices.
- Participants will have access to training, thematic workshops, mentoring, collaboration opportunities, grants, scholarships for internships, exchange of experience.

The community is aimed at women community leaders, active members of rural communities, local development experts and professionals, civil society organizations, local action groups, local public authorities, relevant institutions and organizations.

as an implementation partner, INAMP will contribute to the capacity building component, through expertise in professional training and the facilitation of learning processes for the public administration and relevant actors.
